CHELSTIE SMITH double-majored in international business and English and minored in Spanish at the University of Maryland.

“Choosing the ‘right’ law school was one of the most important decisions in my life. After comparing all of the programs, centers, and student life and extracurricular opportunities, my heart was set on UVA,” Smith said. “Little did I know that my first week of law school would far surpass my entire experience as an undergraduate student. My fellow classmates, the professors and even the deans have made this place feel like home away from home. I am confident UVA is the ‘right’ law school for me.”

Before law school, JOHN MCGLOTHLIN served as a paratrooper and Arabic linguist in the U.S. Army. "Originally I wasn't going to apply to UVA because I wanted to go to school in a big city," he said. "[But] in the post-admissions process, UVA just stood head and shoulders above the other schools I got into. The culture's different, the follow-up is different."

A former reporter, McGlothlin joined the Army after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"As a journalist, you can influence the news by reporting things that people need to know, and then they might change their behavior. But you're a step removed," he said. "That wasn't good enough for me anymore."

He said he is now turning to law because "it's the foundation that everything's built on."
