Dear Ron:

This is just a hasty note to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 14th and your story on "The Decision to Prosecute". While I have not yet had time to read the story, I look forward to the pleasure of doing so. Also, I will promptly pass it along to the appropriate Law Review editors for their perusal. The Review is interested in publishing a good short story about once a year; however, as you know, the students are jealous of their prerogative in making editorial decisions, so I do not know what the reaction will be on your story. In any event, someone from the Review will be in touch with you later.

I also have your most interesting letter of December 29th. Why I have not written you? I suppose the answer is as usual: procrastination, press of administrative duties, flu and assorted other interferences. Certainly the best of intentions has been there, and I will be writing you in greater length within the near future.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Daniel J. Meador
Dean
