Summary

At its forty-fourth session, held on 18 February 2005 and from 8 to 17 February and 22 March 2006, the Commission for Social Development considered the priority theme “Review of the first United Nations Decade on the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)”, and the review of relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups.

On the priority theme, the Commission heard a keynote address by Clare Short of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and held a panel discussion. The Commission decided to transmit the Chairperson’s summary of the discussion to the coordination segment on “Sustained economic growth for social development, including the eradication of poverty and hunger” of the 2006 substantive session of the Economic and Social Council.

Also under the priority theme, the Commission heard a presentation by the Division for Social Policy and Development on a technical cooperation project “Tackling poverty together: the role of young people in poverty reduction”.

The Commission adopted a resolution on “Social dimensions of the New Partnership for Africa’s Development”, according to which the Council would recommend that the Commission continue to give prominence to the social dimensions of the New Partnership during its forty-fifth session.

In connection with its review of plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups, the Commission adopted a resolution on modalities for the first review and appraisal of the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002. To promote wider awareness of the first review and appraisal, a panel discussion was organized in order to bring before the Commission experts with in-depth knowledge of ageing issues and bottom-up participatory methodologies. The Chairperson’s summary of the discussion is contained in the annex to the present report.

The Commission also recommended to the Economic and Social Council the adoption of a resolution on a comprehensive and integral international convention to protect and promote the rights and dignity of persons with disabilities and a resolution on promoting youth employment.

The Commission addressed the subject of the further review of the methods of work of the Commission, and recommended to the Council that the theme for the 2007/2008 review and policy cycle would be “Promoting full employment and decent work for all”, taking into account the interrelationship between employment, poverty eradication and social integration.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 60/227 on international migration and development, the Commission decided to transmit, through the Economic and Social Council, to the high-level dialogue on international migration and development, planned in September 2006 during the sixty-first session of the General Assembly, the Chairperson’s summary of the panel discussion on “International migration and migrants from a social perspective”, held during the forty-second session of the Commission.

Recalling and reaffirming the commitments relating to youth employment made at the major United Nations conferences and summits since 1990 and their follow-up processes,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 54/120 of 17 December 1999, in which the Assembly took note with appreciation of the Lisbon Declaration on Youth Policies and Programmes adopted at the World Conference of Ministers Responsible for Youth in 1998,³ which set forth important commitments regarding youth employment, and recalling also Assembly resolutions 56/117 of 19 December 2001 and 57/165 of 18 December 2002,

Recognizing also that Governments have a primary responsibility to educate young people, to encourage them to seek training so as to increase their employability and to create an enabling environment that will promote youth employment,

Recognizing further the need to promote, protect and fully respect the basic rights of young workers as defined by relevant International Labour Organization and other international instruments,

Decision 44/101

International migration and migrants from a social perspective

The Commission for Social Development, recalling General Assembly resolution 60/227 of 23 December 2005, entitled “International migration and development”, in which the Assembly noted that the Commission on Population and Development, the Commission for Social Development and the Commission on the Status of Women would have considered the issue of international migration within their respective mandates by the time of the high-level dialogue on international migration and development and invited their inputs through the Economic and Social Council, and the panel discussion on “International migration and migrants from a social perspective” held during its forty-second session:

Decides to transmit, through the Economic and Social Council, to the high-level dialogue on international migration and development, to be held in September 2006 during the sixty-first session of the General Assembly, the Chairperson’s summary of the panel discussion on international migration and migrants from a social perspective, held during its forty-second session.22

Decision 44/102

The Commission for Social Development, recalling the priority theme of its forty-fourth session entitled “Review of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)”, and the panel discussion held on the priority theme during the same session:

Decides to transmit to the coordination segment of the Economic and Social Council on the theme “Sustained economic growth for social development, including the eradication of poverty and hunger”, to be held during its 2006 substantive session, the Chairperson’s summary of the panel discussion on the priority theme, as follows:

Chairperson’s summary of the panel discussion on the priority theme “Review of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)”

Progress over the Decade

There was general agreement that progress in poverty eradication has been mixed. While some regions have recorded strong performances (East Asia and part of South Asia, for example) others were less successful (sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America, for instance).

It was pointed out, however, that there are still some important unresolved methodological issues regarding the measurement of poverty and that the overall picture of progress in poverty eradication can be different dependent on the assumptions and regional decomposition that are used when measuring poverty. For example, the Millennium Development Goal on poverty measures extreme poverty using the income line of $1 a day and there have been questions about whether this narrow concept of poverty provides a good indicator for monitoring poverty.

The importance of increasing the visibility of poor people received significant attention and it was stressed that when the poor are seen and made visible this can advance policies that will directly address their needs. In this regard, the point was made that better statistics are needed to measure poverty and raise the visibility of the poor. It was noted that a useful strategy to increase the visibility of the poor is to require policymakers to undertake poverty assessments of their proposed policies.

It was felt that the implementation of commitments made during the Decade had fallen short of expectations and there was evidence of an inverse correlation between promises made at Copenhagen and the results achieved thus far. Emerging trends suggest that progress on some social indicators, such as school enrolment and infant mortality, have slowed down in the past decade.

Key challenges in Africa

It was pointed out that while some regions in the world have experienced gains in the struggle against poverty, many countries in sub-Saharan Africa continue to be characterized by poverty that is pervasive, gender-based and largely rural in nature. It was observed that among the key factors that have led to increased poverty levels in many parts of Africa are lack of adequate infrastructure, poor human resources management, difficulties in accessing global markets; droughts and famine, political upheavals, conflicts and civil strife and the impact of HIV/AIDS, malaria, tuberculosis and other diseases.

Agriculture remains the main economic activity for the majority of Africans, especially in the sub-Saharan region where it employs around 90 per cent of the rural population. However, agriculture is currently unable to sustain the needs of the expanding population because of problems such as low investments, poor quality seeds, lack of fertilizers, poor farming methods and lack of affordable technology.

The importance of involving people in poverty alleviation strategies was stressed; “bottom-up” strategies with broad-based participation have been proven to work better with grass-roots support. Unemployment, especially among young people, is a serious problem and in order to achieve full, productive and decent employment, realistic and time-bound goals and targets need to be set.

Access to financial resources

Despite the mixed results with poverty eradication over the Decade, the last 10 years have shown that increasing the access of poor people to financial resources through microfinance is one of the success stories in poverty eradication. During the last decade, the number of people benefiting from microfinance has grown from 9 million to about 60 million borrowers worldwide.

Besides microfinance, remittances of funds has been receiving increased attention in recent years. However, despite the significant size of these flows, recipient countries have made little progress in harnessing them for local development. A significant portion of remittances is currently being used for current consumption, rather than for investment in education, for example. Local financial institutions can benefit from these remittance flows if they make an effort to change this pattern of expenditure by providing other services, such as housing loans and improved savings products to their customers.

International cooperation

It was acknowledged that the Decade for the Eradication of Poverty has been successful in placing poverty eradication at the centre of the international agenda and public opinion and has increasingly shaped national agendas. However, in terms of the commitment made in Copenhagen towards an enabling environment for social development, it was felt that there had been limited progress specifically in advancing access by developing countries to international economic opportunities and in achieving a system of fair trade. In addition, it was noted that there has been slow progress in providing debt relief to heavily indebted countries.

The importance of aid as a source of necessary resources for poverty eradication was highlighted. It was reiterated that efforts by developing countries to achieve the Millennium Development Goals should be matched by corresponding efforts by developed countries to reach their overseas development assistance goal of 0.7 per cent of gross national product. Aid contributes significantly to development because data have shown that countries having received significant levels of aid have experienced better economic growth than others. However, it is important to distinguish two kinds of aid: developmental aid and geopolitical aid. It is only in the first case that aid can help countries in their development goals.

But aid per se is not a solution. It is also important that Governments be given the policy space needed to decide home-grown poverty reduction strategies and initiatives that reflect country-specific conditions and priorities, while at the same time taking into account the importance of efforts at the regional level. It was acknowledged that while the increased focus on the Millennium Development Goals has resulted in large amounts of aid flowing into specific areas, this could result in a decrease in innovation in the use of such development assistance.

Overcoming obstacles and looking forward

It was stressed that unless there is a radical change in how poverty is addressed by governments and the international community, the poverty targets, including the Millennium Development Goals will not be achieved. It was noted in this context that while the World Summit on Social Development targeted poor people around the world, both in developed and developing countries, the current emphasis on the Millennium Development Goals directs attention mainly to the plight of the poor in developing countries.

It is important to recognize that growth alone is insufficient to reduce poverty. The quality of growth, that is the distribution of the benefits of growth, is also important. There is therefore a need to link growth centres with the rest of the population so that the benefits of growth are broad-based and widespread. In addition, the link between poverty eradication and full and productive employment was emphasized. In this context, the International Labour Organization decent work agenda was highlighted. Self-employment and microenterprises are the backbone of many economies, but for these types of enterprises to provide an exit out of poverty, poor people need to move into higher value activities. In this regard access to education is a critical component.

The private sector can play an important role in poverty eradication. In the microfinance sector, for example, the private sector has been an important component in expanding access of microfinance to women and youth. It is therefore necessary for the private sector to work with policymakers to achieve poverty eradication.

Finally, an important development during the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty has been enhanced partnerships. These can take the form of public-private, public-private-civil society or developed-developing countries partnerships. Partnerships between governments, civil society and the private sector, for example, have been shown to enhance efforts to eradicate poverty.

Decision 44/103

Annex

Chairperson’s summary of the panel discussion on the review and appraisal of the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002

The objective of the panel discussion was to illustrate the value of participatory methodologies and to provide practical examples of how bottom-up approaches can inform policy implementation and review and appraisal exercises. The Commission agreed, in its resolution 42/1, to adopt a bottom-up approach for the review and appraisal of the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002.

Participatory bottom-up monitoring by civil society

A project in Bolivia illustrates how older persons can contribute to the policy process with sufficient support. Monitoring groups of older persons in five cities were established by a non-governmental organization that monitored the entitlement to free medical insurance for older persons. The monitoring groups wanted to find out whether older persons knew about their right to health care (free for persons over age 60), had access to it and were being treated with respect when seeking it. The groups also wanted to see if health care was being funded according to law.

It was found that older persons were discriminated against if they were only able to speak in their native language; they were sometimes treated badly by health care staff or not treated because they are old; and often had to wait for 5 to 8 hours to see a doctor. In rural areas, older persons had no access to free medical care. Many lacked the documentation needed to access their right to free care and did not know where or how to get it. Doctors and administrators indicated that a major problem was that the national health fund was not receiving adequate resources to fund the free health care programme. Therefore, the monitoring groups met with the responsible local and national authorities, with an improved outcome: older persons no longer have to wait as long to see a doctor, and the Ministry of Finance is providing payment to the health services for older care.

Benefits of bringing older persons into the policy process

A key issue for older persons in the Republic of Moldova was rapid emigration of youth (up to half of the population in some villages), which had left many older persons without family support. More than one in six of those remaining in the country were older persons, approximately 44 per cent of whom were considered to be poor because pensions provided only about one quarter of the minimum subsistence. There had been attempts by the Government in recent years to provide some minimum level of additional benefits but there was no national plan of action on ageing.

A national non-governmental organization undertook a participatory mapping exercise with older persons in 2005 which identified priority areas for policy changes. The results, which were presented to Government officials, civil society and the media in 2005, included older persons having more self-confidence and knowledge about their rights; a feeling of being more useful to society as a result of volunteer activities and training others; more contact with younger persons; and a better understanding from the Government on issues concerning older persons.

Government/civil society mechanisms for review and appraisal

The “bottom-up approach” to review and appraisal was a process that should involve all stakeholders. The Philippines had a long history of participation between non-governmental organizations and the Government. Non-governmental organizations were represented at the national and regional levels. An office of senior citizens affairs was to be established in each municipality under a new plan of action, to be headed by a senior citizen. The Philippines had the building blocks in place for a more in-depth participatory approach as envisioned in the Madrid review and appraisal process.

However the evaluation undertaken by the inter-agency committee on the implementation of the previous national plan of action (1999-2004) had shown little participation in policy formulation by older persons due to poverty, lack of knowledge or indifference. Pilot community workshops and seminars recently held pointed to a lack of awareness of laws, rights and entitlements of older persons and low participation rates by the poor, due mainly to financial constraints. The case studies of projects in Bolivia and Moldova illustrated how including older persons into the policy process can overcome these issues.

These few examples made it clear that bottom-up, participatory review and appraisal can be a tool for better decision-making and improved policies and programmes. Participatory methods provide essential information to policymakers and help older persons feel more connected to their societies. The approach is in line with the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, which views older persons as active contributors rather than passive recipients of care.
