The Council has met at a critical juncture in international relations in many respects. The world economic situation that we have considered has emerged as a difficult, even grim one, for all countries, and there is little prospect for improvement in the coming months.
Progress in international negotiations during the last few months has been slow and uneven. And, as the Secretary-General has pointed out, if the dialogue is to move ahead and provide solutions to current pressing problems of the world economy a new impetus is clearly necessary.

In all these areas the need for joint reflection, frank discussions and fresh approaches was felt by all delegations at the beginning of the session, and this was re-lected in their statements in the general debate, in the Committees and during informal consultations. It is a source of satisfaction to me that, thanks to the collective endeavours of all participating delegations, this session has proved to be a substantial and stimulating one, with high standards of debate.

The seriousness of the world economic situation was recognized by all participants in the debate in the plenary Council. I share the concern that the transition period to the 1980s will not be an easy one. 1978 was not a good year for the world economy, and as a consequence the pace of development in the developing world was severely affected. Current trends are not favourable and immediate prospects indicate a slowdown rather than an acceleration. The analysis pre-ented by the International Monetary Fund shows a resurgence of inflationary pressures, and it is likely that industrialized economies will face again a high rate of inflation. A certain convergence of opinion seems to have emerged on the diagnosis of the present situation, based on the following facts:

First, the economies of the developed countries are experiencing prolonged difficulties, reflected by the persistence of high levels of unemployment, inflation and pervasive uncertainty. Their growth rate is likely to remain low in the immediate future, and they will not provide sufficient impetus to the world economy. Import demand is likely to remain sluggish, and under present conditions donor countries stress the difficulties in providing increased official development assistance.
There is a growing recognition that the causes of the difficulties in industrialized economies are of a deep-rooted nature and that some hard choices will have to be made.

Secondly, the developing countries, particularly those that are importers of oil and that had previously managed to retain a certain dynamism, have seen their average growth rate drop to 4 per cent and are seriously threatened by disquieting developments. Their terms of trade have been steadily deteriorating, their current account deficits are increasing fast, their export potential is hampered by protectionism in developed markets,
In this context, the issue of the future shape of the negotiations has been raised, and several references were made to the recommendations adopted in Colombo by the ministerial meeting of the co-ordination bureau of the non-aligned countries, suggesting that global negotiations should be undertaken within the United Nations system. This proposal will be considered by the Havana meeting of Heads of State and Government of the non-aligned countries. The Council thus served as a forum in which countries can compare their assessment of the general situation of international economic negotiations, express their views on conditions for progress beyond the present situation, and explore new arrangements for negotiations. It also highlighted a number of key issues, of which I will quote only a few.

The question of energy emerged as a central issue for almost every delegation and was considered in a very direct way. A number of delegations, particularly those of oil-importing developing countries, described the problems their countries have to face in adjusting to a higher level of energy prices and in organizing the transition to new sources of energy. They recognized the problem to be both global and long-term in nature, needing concerted action to save energy, develop domestic sources and co-operate on common policies.

The importance of the forthcoming United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy was repeatedly stressed and many delegations supported the idea of an increased involvement of the United Nations system in this area that had been suggested by the Secretary-General in his statement. Some delegations expressed the hope that direct contacts would be established between producers and consumers of oil. Those developing countries that are both producers and consumers stated that the energy issue could not be discussed in isolation from that of international economic cooperation in other fields, and in doing so linked discussion of this question to decisions taken on the broader question of the North-South dialogue. Thus, current difficulties in the energy field could result in giving a fresh impetus to the process of the North-South dialogue, and provide a very strong incentive to consider all the options open for action, particularly in favour of the oil-importing developing countries.

The problems of trade and industrial adjustment also received much attention in the Council's debate. Developing and socialist countries highlighted the negative consequences for their economies of protectionist measures taken by market-economy developed countries, and although the latter insisted on the limited and provisional nature of those measures, it was repeatedly stressed that trade in manufactures with developing countries had brought them considerable benefits. The disappointment of the developing countries with the latest round of trade negotiations also came out very strongly, as did their intention to press for further negotiations in the trade area before accepting the results of this round. Trade barriers appear to be a major obstacle to structural adjustment in the world economy, impeding both changes in developed countries and the industrialization of developing countries. Policies of structural adjustment are thus clearly needed to revitalize industrial activities in developed countries, to moderate the impact of an increased flow of trade from developing countries and improve world economic prospects.

With respect to food and agriculture, the very fragile food situation in a considerable number of developing countries was highlighted in our debate. A particular concern emerged from the assessment by the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations regarding the likely drop of 6 per cent in wheat and coarse grain production in the current year. Appropriate policies in the areas of food aid and food security thus remain vital under present conditions. In this context, the importance of support for the five-point plan submitted by the Director-General of FAO as an interim world food security measure was stressed. In the long run, however, at stake is what many of you have called for: a greater emphasis on agricultural development as a means for developing countries to enhance their economic independence. A timely replenishment of IFAD resources can be of particular importance in this respect. For self-reliance to become a reality, agricultural development should become a priority sector in the new international development strategy.

An issue frequently highlighted in our discussion is the essential role played by science and technology in the development process. In fact, I share the view that technological and scientific progress is at the core of changes in industrial structures, agricultural productivity and over-all development. Hence the importance of finding new avenues and improving ways and means by which technological and scientific achievements can be increasingly placed at the service of mankind. The United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, held in Vienna in August 1979, was said to provide a unique opportunity to revitalize the North-South dialogue and to improve international cooperation measures for rapid scientific and technological progress in developing countries.

The preparation of a new international development strategy provides us with an opportunity to consider all those policy measures together and review their future impact and potential. But the meagre results achieved so far by the Preparatory Committee are disquieting. The Chairman of this Committee reminded us that in the course of three sessions the Committee had not been able to agree on an outline for the strategy or even on part of it, and, that major conceptual problems — which, it was thought, had been solved at the time when General Assembly resolution 33/193 was negotiated — had emerged once again. He also expressed the hope that the strategy would be adopted not later than 1980, at the special session of the General Assembly, and that it would prove to be a practical document, providing an outline of policy measures, allowing the international community to begin the formidable task of tackling mass poverty and establishing the new international economic order. It is my earnest hope that the Council's discussions will have contributed to a reconsideration of the divergence of views that has emerged on the question of the objectives of the Strategy and to the creation of the climate of trust and constructive co-operation which is necessary if this collective endeavour is to meet its deadline.

A number of statements made have shed new light on the difficulties that await us during the 1980s. The analysis in the World Bank’s Development Report 1979 indicated that, even to achieve a rate of economic growth in developing countries in the 1980s of 5.6 per cent, a significant reversal of current trends would have to take place. Developed countries would have to achieve a higher rate of growth and trade and aid policies would have to improve substantially. What is perhaps more frightening is that a 5.6 per cent rate of growth in developing countries would still leave hundreds of millions of people living in absolute poverty by the end of the century.

Clearly, forceful national and international measures are necessary to reverse present trends and start developing countries on the path of accelerated, self-sustained and autonomous growth. In view of the urgent demands of development which will arise by the end of the century, a resumption of growth in developed countries can be neither a pre-condition of policy measures nor an absolute constraint on the indispensable growth of developing countries. The policy measures needed are now well-known, particularly in the fields of trade and transfer of resources, and have been restated by delegations and heads of specialized agencies alike during the debate. Protectionist pressures have to be overcome and liberalization should proceed further. Resource transfers have to be increased and the conditions under which medium-term and long-term capital flows are channelled must be improved significantly. In this context disarmament, as many delegations have stressed, might also release resources to increase these flows.

Thus the diagnosis of the problems affecting the world economy and the growth of the developing countries which emerged from the debate confirmed the need for a continued North-South dialogue and for a renewed political will on all sides. I believe that the high quality of the general debate proves that this Council continues to provide a very useful forum within the United Nations and that it performs an important role.

I now come to the final part of my summing up. What has the Council done to discharge its duties and to respond to new ideas and practices that have emerged over the last few years? What has the Council done to assist the United Nations system as a whole, and to fulfil its specific role within the United Nations family as one of its principal organs?

Speaking of the United Nations in general, I detect two tendencies. In the first place, new practices have been tried and new forms of consultation and negotiation have come into existence, expanding the system beyond the machinery originally envisaged by the authors of the Charter. In the second place, there is the obvious need to preserve the Charter as it stands and to keep any adjustments within its provisions and limitations. These two tendencies are sometimes at variance with each other or even contradictory; it is therefore our continuous duty to reconcile the two.

In 1977 an impressive effort was made to adapt the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system to new and renewable circumstances. A broad set of new ideas on restructuring those sectors was put together in a comprehensive document, the symbol of which has now become a symbol in its own right: General Assembly resolution 32/197. Today, almost two years later, we in this Council find that many or even most parts of that particular resolution have been translated from theory into practice. Many indeed, but not all of them. The structure of the Council itself and its own subsidiary machinery has resisted reform and restructuring. During almost two years great attention and much energy have been devoted to our task of imposing the wisdom of resolution 32/197 on the Council and its own house. Those efforts have been useful in the sense that they have provided us with a clearer perception of our own needs, our possibilities and our limitations. As the Council was faced with today’s realities, both inside its structure and elsewhere, no agreement could be reached on fundamental changes. Thus the Council had to acknowledge that some of the dreams of 1977 were too ambitious or perhaps simply premature. In its turn, the General Assembly will also have to acknowledge this fact. Nevertheless, a number of important proposals for the working procedures of this Council and the broadening of the participation in its work remain on record for future reference.

The Council will thus continue to function for the time being in its present form. But we should all realize that the Charter provides a very broad framework for the activities and debates of the Council and that the existing institution can achieve a great deal, provided that it organizes its work well. In this regard, I believe that the progress we have achieved in the matter of summary records of a number of subsidiary bodies of the Council, the streamlining of the calendar of conferences and the adoption of a set of rules on the question of documentation are a modest but useful contribution to the improvement of the procedures of the Council. In fact I believe that the Council, by agreeing on these seemingly minor improvements, has been of assistance to the United Nations and to the General Assembly, thereby setting an example that other organs may well wish to follow.

While fulfilling its current duties, the Council has served as a stepping stone for a number of new initiatives. In this context I would like to pay tribute to the very important work done in the subsidiary machinery of the Council, which brings together representatives from all sectors of governments and from our respective peoples and societies. For many of these sectors the work in the functional commissions and standing committees of the Council constitutes one of the most important channels of communication with international developments, on a world-wide scale. Furthermore, the consultative relationship of non-governmental organizations adds a particularly valuable dimension to the Council’s work. It is the continuous responsibility of the Council to create optimum conditions for all these inputs to thrive and to be beneficial to its work.

Certain procedures and practices, developed over the years or, in some cases, recently, have again constituted a significant contribution to the functioning of the Council. Informal contacts with the heads of agencies and the Executive Secretaries of the regional commissions merit special mention in this respect, as does the personal appearance of those officials in the Council. The practice of informal consultations between heads of delegations, or in particular cases among interested delegations, has equally assisted the Council in expediting its official decision-making process. This procedure should no doubt be continued and even intensified. In those exceptional cases where no adequate informal preparation could take place in time, the result sometimes was a prolonged debate in formal meetings, thus illustrating the usefulness of the preparatory consultative process.

We have thus come to the end of this summer session of the Council. I would like to conclude this statement by a word of thanks to all delegations, to the other members of the Bureau whose able performance has so greatly contributed to the work of the Council, and to the Secretariat staff, both visible and invisible. I wish you all a well-deserved vacation.

The resolutions and decisions in question are listed below; references to the corresponding chapters of the report are supplied.

GENERAL DISCUSSION OF INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL POLICY, INCLUDING REGIONAL AND SECTORAL DEVELOPMENTS

Resolution and decisions brought to the attention of the General Assembly

The role of the public sector in promoting the economic development of developing countries

By resolution 1979/48, after recalling Council resolutions 1978/60 and 1978/75 and General Assembly resolution 33/144 and after taking note of the Secretary-General's report on the role of the public sector in promoting the economic development of developing countries and of comments made thereon during the debate, the Council recommended that the Secretary-General's report should be transmitted to the Assembly in accordance with Assembly resolution 32/179 and that the future progress reports envisaged in that resolution should be prepared and submitted as from 1981; requested the Secretary-General, in preparing the next report, to give special consideration to changes occurring in the roles and modalities of the public sector as a result of new perceptions and priorities of development; further recommended that at its thirty-fourth session the Assembly should review the report transmitted to it by the resolution in order to determine which aspects of the role of the public sector require further study; and invited the appropriate organizations within the United Nations system to give due attention in their studies to the relevant aspects of the role of the public sector in promoting the economic and social development of the developing countries.

and authorized the Secretary-General to transmit to the General Assembly, at its thirty-fourth session, the report on the preparations for its special session in 1980, to be issued pursuant to Assembly resolution 33/198 (E/1979/97), and the report of the Preparatory Committee for the New International Development Strategy on its work during the remainder of 1979.

The United Nations Yearbook, in providing a longer be issued behind, the Secretary-General

What decisions were made regarding human rights? The Council endorsed the decision of the General Assembly on its thirty-first session, which requested the Secretary-General to nominate a Special Rapporteur on human rights in Chile, and to compile for the information of the United Nations system and the Secretary-General a list of the names of the officials of the United Nations system concerned with human rights.

The General Assembly had also requested the Commission on Human Rights to present to the General Assembly a report on the operation of the Commission, including its programme of work and the activities and programmes within the United Nations system, and to make recommendations. The Council decided to extend the annual session of the Sub-Commission on the study of reported violations of human rights in Chile to four weeks, to express its appreciation of the work of the Special Rapporteur on Genocide, and to authorize its Chairman to authorize any additional working group to study the question of the fate of missing and disappeared persons in Chile.

The Council also decided to extend the annual session of the Sub-Commission on the study of reported violations of human rights in southern Africa to four weeks, to request the General Assembly to request the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to make arrangements for the provision of adequate financial resources and staff for the implementation of resolution 11 (XXXV), and to request the General Assembly to request the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to make arrangements for the provision of adequate financial resources and staff for the implementation of resolution 11 (XXXV).

What are the implications of these decisions? These decisions have implications for the United Nations' role in promoting and protecting human rights, particularly in the context of the specific countries mentioned, Chile and southern Africa. The appointment of a special rapporteur and the compilation of a list of officials concerned with human rights are crucial for ensuring accountability and addressing violations. The extension of sessions and the provision of financial resources are essential for the Commission and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to effectively carry out their mandates.

How does the document reflect global human rights concerns? The document reflects global human rights concerns by highlighting specific cases and violations, such as the study of reported violations of human rights in Chile, the operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, and the United Nations' role in promoting and protecting human rights globally. It also emphasizes the importance of cooperation among States and with international organizations to address human rights issues.

In conclusion, the United Nations Yearbook serves as a valuable resource for understanding the progress, challenges, and recommendations in the field of human rights. It underscores the ongoing efforts of the United Nations to promote and protect human rights, and the importance of international cooperation in this regard.

discontinue all support to them until they restore to the peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia their inalienable right to self-determination and independence, and to refrain from taking any action which might imply recognition of, or support for, the illegal domination of the territories by those régimes; noted with satisfaction the arrangements made by several specialized agencies and United Nations institutions which enable representatives of the national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity to participate fully as observers in the proceedings relating to matters concerning their respective countries, and called upon those international institutions which have not yet done so to follow this example and make the necessary arrangements without delay; recommended that all Governments should intensify their efforts in the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system of which they are members to ensure the full and effective implementation of the relevant resolutions of United Nations bodies; urged the executive heads of the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system to formulate, with the active co-operation of the Organization of African Unity, and to submit, as a matter of priority, to their governing and legislative organs, concrete proposals for the full implementation of the relevant United Nations decisions; drew the attention of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to this resolution and to the discussions on the subject at the Council's second regular session of 1979; requested its President to continue consultations on this matter with the Chairman of the Special Committee and to report thereon to the Council; requested the Secretary-General, through ACC, to follow the implementation of the present resolution, to ensure that the relevant activities of the specialized agencies and the organizations within the United Nations system are effectively co-ordinated and to report thereon to the Council; and decided to keep the question under continuous review.

3. The documentary material before the Council in connexion with this agenda item included the report of the Preparatory Committee for the New International Development Strategy (A/34/44); a summary of the Economic Survey of Europe in 1978 (E/1979/42); the World Economic Survey, 1978 (E/1979/62 and Add. 1-3); a summary of economic and social conditions in Africa, 1977-1978 (E/1979/70); a summary of the economic and social survey of Asia and the Pacific, 1978 (E/1979/71); a report on economic trends in Latin America in 1978 (E/1979/72); a summary of the survey of economic and social development in the ECWA region, 1970-1978 (E/1979/73); and a report by the Secretariat reviewing the progress made in the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade (E/AC.5/422 and Corr.1 and Add.1). In addition, the Council drew upon several reports by the United Nations Secretariat and the governing bodies of specialized agencies and the report of the Committee for Development Planning on its fifteenth session. Statements in connexion with the subject of the general debate were submitted by a number of non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Council.

4. In his opening statement (E/1979/SR.19), the President said that the Council's session followed one crucial event — the fifth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development — and preceded other equally important events, notably the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, the Third General Conference of UNIDO and the special session of the General Assembly in 1980. He felt that the session was opening under conditions which allowed the Council to acknowledge the full seriousness of the economic and social situation and the need for fresh approaches to changing international patterns.

5. The Council might wish, therefore, to reflect on its role within the United Nations; together with the representatives of all the agencies participating in its deliberations, it had a unique chance to take stock of the state of the system, to outline its future action and to define more precisely its responsibilities, in the light of the General Assembly resolution on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations. In addition, it would have the opportunity to explore possibilities for giving impetus to current discussions within the United Nations on the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly on the establishment of a new international economic order, by reviewing the situation, making suggestions — perhaps only tentative — for new or alternative courses of action, in short by seeing how the Council could make its contribution to the new world in the making. The general discussion of international economic and social policy, including regional and sectoral developments, was therefore set within the broadest possible framework, so as to encourage a frank exchange of views on current economic and social problems. These problems were due largely to the fact that structural changes were under way and that the world had not yet found how to ensure that such changes proceeded harmoniously.

6. In addition to the World Economic Survey, the Council would be considering a number of reports and ideas concerning, in particular, the review and appraisal of existing international organizations, the proposed United Nations system, regional and sectoral developments, the role of the public sector in promoting economic development in developing countries, the interrelationship between population, resources, environment and development.

38 A detailed list of the documentation appears in the annotations to the provisional agenda for the Council's second regular session of 1979 (E/1979/100).

of the International Development Strategy for the Second Development Decade and the "forward look" emerging from the preparations for a strategy for the third United Nations development decade, as well as a large number of matters related to the international economic and social situation. Furthermore, it would be called upon to give due consideration to the economic and social consequences of disarmament.

7. The Council would consider, in addition, the question of co-ordination within the United Nations system. The machinery for interagency co-ordination had been restructured so that it would be better able to meet the needs of the central intergovernmental bodies of the United Nations, such as the Council, and to deal with problems of development and other central concerns of the United Nations. He expressed the hope that the session would fulfill the expectations of Governments in contributing to the betterment of the economic and social conditions of all peoples, especially those who were still crying for longer and better lives, for nourishment, for health, for education, for human dignity and for a useful and meaningful life.

8. In his introductory statement (E/1979/SR.19), the Secretary-General said that it was even more true today than when the Council had been established that there could be no real peace unless the development of all countries created the conditions for the well-being of all peoples. In the space of 34 years, the world economy had undergone many changes. It had experienced two major phases during that period. During the first phase, which had lasted nearly 25 years, the growth of the industrialized economies had been exceptionally rapid and sustained, but the impetus of that growth had not enabled the developing countries to lay the foundations for their own independent growth. The second phase, after the collapse of the Bretton Woods system, had been characterized by inflation and a slackening in economic growth — clear evidence of the need for a new international economic order.

9. The world economy's continuing weak performance in 1978 had made the introduction of that order a matter of urgency. The recovery in the developed market economies after the 1973-1975 recession had remained modest, and most of the countries which had succeeded in maintaining a certain momentum would experience slower expansion in 1979 because of imbalances in external payments and a fresh surge of inflation. For their part, the centrally planned economy countries were suffering increasingly from balance-of-payments constraints and were fixing cautious production targets. In the developing countries the trend was also towards slower growth. The average rate of growth of the gross domestic product of these countries as a group had declined in 1976 as compared with the period from 1971 to 1975, and the rate of growth was likely to decline still further in 1979.

10. The world economic situation was thus dominated by the persistence of imbalances which tended to create a climate of uncertainty that affected investment in a negative way. Inflation remained a threat, the balance-of-payments adjustment mechanisms were not working satisfactorily, and there was an intensification of protectionist pressures. With considerable efforts, Governments had in recent years been able to eliminate some of the consequences of the crisis; but, because of the failure to take action with regard to the structures and mechanisms of the economy, they had not succeeded in controlling the causes.

11. The difficulties were particularly evident in North-South relations, where the negotiations had achieved only modest progress in the past year. The fifth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development had shown that many countries were still reluctant to accept the full implications of the growing interdependence of economies. In addition, the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole Established under General Assembly Resolution 32/174 and of the Preparatory Committee for the New International Development Strategy had achieved only limited results. The genuine difficulties facing the developed countries obviously did not make the tasks of their Governments any easier; yet, joint action in favour of the developing countries, in a number of priority areas, would surely give a new impetus to the world economy, since those countries could become the driving force for growth. It was necessary, therefore, to proceed with the North-South negotiations without waiting for a recovery in the developed countries, and he thought it should be possible to make progress on certain specific points of a priority nature.

12. Increased resource transfers to developing countries would enable those countries to adjust to fluctuations in the world economy without excessive damage to their own development programme and to stabilize and increase their imports, which would benefit the export industries and reduce unemployment in the developed countries. So far as trade was concerned, he considered that a lessening of the protectionism in developed countries would enable the developing countries to expand their industrial export potential, would lower prices and would contribute to the attainment of the Lima target of locating 25 per cent of the world's industrial capacity in the developing countries by the year 2000.

13. Proceeding, the Secretary-General stressed that the world food situation remained disturbing. The international community had to mobilize its resources in order to furnish the financial and technical assistance necessary for the achievement of the target of a 2 per cent rate of annual growth of agricultural production in the developing countries. Food security had also to be supported by the establishment of adequate reserves, particularly of grains. In order to offset the probable food deficit in developing countries during the 1980s, food aid would have to be substantial and more flexible.

14. Serious consideration would have to be given to the ways in which the international community might deal with the energy problem and respond to the prospect of the eventual exhaustion of petroleum reserves. Experience had taught that supplies of this essential commodity and their cost were matters of vital importance to the world economy and essential factors in the balance of payments of all countries, that petroleum-exporting countries did not want their reserves to be used up at too fast a rate and that the long-term growth of the world economy could no longer rely on cheap energy.

15. There were three lines along which action should be taken to ensure an orderly transition to patterns of energy consumption less dependent on petroleum and to more energy-saving measures, particularly in the developed countries; secondly, major investment to find and bring into production new conventional energy deposits, particularly in the developing countries, and to search for new and renewable sources of energy; and thirdly, specific action in favour of the oil-importing developing countries to enable them to face the financial consequences of the progressive adjustment of energy costs and have access to the supplies they needed to continue their development and industrialization efforts. He was in contact with Governments in order to determine what useful contribution the United Nations could make to the solution of those basic problems and hoped that the proposal he had made in 1977 for the establishment of a world energy institute would be further examined. It was surely hardly conceivable that so important an issue as that of energy could be dealt with outside the United Nations.

16. The existing situation regarding the North-South negotiations seemed unacceptable, and progress could not be postponed until later. The negotiations currently under way within the United Nations system in New York, at Geneva and elsewhere should be capable of lending each other mutual support, but the main obstacle to successful negotiations did not lie in the institutional machinery. It was essential that Governments should demonstrate a political will to reach realistic compromises, particularly in the areas of food and agriculture, energy, financial problems and protectionism.

17. In view of the need to enhance the effectiveness of deliberations and negotiations in the United Nations, he thought it might, for example, be advisable for the Council, at the beginning of each summer session, to hold a meeting lasting two or three days, at ministerial level, to discuss the world economic situation. The Council might also wish to consider the procedures of the General Assembly and the work of the Second and Third Committees, so that it would be possible to adopt new procedures at the beginning of the Assembly's thirty-fourth session. A recent report of the Secretary-General on the rationalization of the procedures and organization of the Assembly (A/34/320) might be particularly useful in those deliberations. The Secretary-General stressed that the United Nations appeared to be capable of performing its role in the field of North-South relations. It was essential, however, that all Member States and all groups of States should take the measure of existing dangers and possibilities and approach the negotiations with a new will and a sense of commitment commensurate with the challenges facing the international community.

General debate

18. Almost all of the delegations that participated in the general debate voiced deep concern about the current economic situation and the increasingly uncertain prospects for world-wide recovery. The analysis in the World Economic Survey, 1978 gave little cause for optimism. In 1978, the pace of economic activity had slackened considerably. The rate of growth of the gross domestic product of developing countries as a group had been only 4 per cent, well below the target set in the International Development Strategy, their terms of trade had deteriorated and their current account deficits had swollen. In developed market economies, although in several of them some improvement had been observed in the second half of 1978, inflation and unemployment remained at unacceptably high levels.

19. Nor did the outlook for the remainder of the decade seem promising. Many representatives said that in 1979 the rate of growth in most developing countries might decline still further and their terms of trade and external deficits might worsen. Prices of essential imports such as fertilizer and capital goods, as well as energy, were continuing to rise and world food prices had reached near record levels. Commenting on this situation, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund stated that inflationary pressures had started to increase again. Consumer prices in industrialized countries might go up by more than 10 per cent in the course of 1979 as compared to 7 per cent in 1978. Under these conditions, in the opinion of a number of representatives, there was the danger that, without a balanced set of policy measures, stabilization policies would depress employment and that protectionist policies would revile as a consequence.

20. Some representatives noted that the existing economic difficulties were different in character from the cyclical recessions which had occurred in earlier decades. Governments seemed to have lost their grip on the national and international economy. While industrialized countries struggled, with little success, to redress imbalances and to approach a more stable growth path, the problems accumulated in developing countries. The total debt of the latter had again increased in 1978 at a disproportionate pace. The service of the debt of non-oil-exporting developing countries was currently absorbing rather more than 12 per cent of their export earnings. In this regard, the situation of many Latin American countries was particularly difficult. The Executive Secretary of ECLA, in his address to the Council, pointed out that many countries in the Latin American region were trapped in the vicious circle of trying to reconcile growth, inflation and debt.

21. Many delegations stated that, in spite of the crucial importance at this juncture of achieving results in the North-South dialogue, very little had in fact been accomplished in that context. Deliberations in the Committee of the Whole Established under General Assembly Resolution 32/174 had made but small progress, while there had been practically no advance after two sessions of the Preparatory Committee for the New International Development Strategy. The Manila session of UNCTAD had also been to a large extent disappointing. Although a measure of agreement had been reached in the deliberations on certain subjects, such as protectionism, structural adjustment, the Integrated Programme for Commodities and the Common Fund, economic cooperation among developing countries, and the new programme for action for least developed countries, no progress had been made at Manila in efforts to deal with the truly crucial issues: global consultations, an increase in official development assistance, the reform of the international monetary system.

22. None the less, several representatives supported the view that the North-South dialogue could and should be revitalized in order to make the New International Economic Order a reality. Advantage should be taken of the opportunities offered by the current session of the Council to restore the momentum to the dialogue and to add to it new dimensions. At the same time, it should be possible to renew the commitment to reach agreement in the important negotiations to be undertaken in the Committee of the Whole Established under General Assembly Resolution 32/174, in the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development (August 1979), the Third General Conference of UNIDO (early 1980) and the special session of the General Assembly scheduled for 1980. The results of an improved dialogue would be decisive for the preparation of the international development strategy for the third United Nations development decade, which was after all the main task that lay ahead.

23. Commenting on this subject, the Chairman of the Preparatory Committee for the New International Development Strategy stressed that the Council should give a political impulse to the whole exercise. By virtue of its central position in the United Nations system, it could impart momentum to the work of the Preparatory Committee. The draft of a strategy was expected to be submitted by that Committee to the General Assembly at the special session in 1980. There was still time to accomplish the task adequately. What was vital at this juncture, he added, was to move away from the periphery of conceptual clarifications and general discussions to the painstaking effort of resolving differences and formulating detailed commitments in order to face the central issue: the preparation of the actual text of the strategy.

24. In the opinion of some delegations, the concept of interdependence — which had been taken into account in the formulation of the new international development strategy and in the current dialogue — was of decisive importance. Because interdependence was a reality, the management of national and international policies became all the more complex. Thus, all had to recognize not only the common interests but also the constraints experienced by the partners in international intercourse. These delegations considered that the demands of the developing countries, however legitimate they might be, should be more in keeping with the real prospects for achieving a balanced growth of the world economy. In industrial countries the possibilities were limited, and attempts to exceed those limits might accentuate inflation and monetary instability, which in turn would produce world-wide repercussions.

25. Other delegations stressed that interdependence had further implications. First, it was clearly in the interest of industrialized countries themselves to promote economic growth in developing countries; thus, in order to solve their own problems in the long term, they should adopt internal and external economic policies designed to utilize to the full the productive capacity of developing countries. Secondly, the developing countries should have an increasing role in the decision-making process. In fact, what differentiated the developed from the developing countries was not in the long-term interest of any country, least of all in the interest of the developing countries. The definition of long-term objectives for global growth consequently should take into account the need to maintain, restore and improve the Earth's capacity to produce essential renewable resources, to avoid the degradation of the environment and to protect non-renewable resources while ensuring that the benefits derived from their exploitation were shared by all mankind. In this regard, a number of delegations emphasized that the United Nations should play a central role in the improvement and accumulation of knowledge concerning the interrelationship of population, resources, the environment and development. The Secretary-General was to be commended for his study of this interrelationship (E/1979/75). The material cited in the study might be found useful by developing countries in the planning of their economic and social development. One delegation said that the United Nations studies on long-term trends in world economic and social development were most valuable. Commenting on these same issues, the Executive Secretary of ECE pointed out the increasing involvement of the Commission with studies concerning restructuring the pattern of consumption, the environment and the use and conservation of energy, all of which had a bearing on changes in the way of life.

27. Some representatives expressed the view that what was indispensable was a radical change in structures. In their opinion, the stagnation in developed market economies was merely a reflection of the incapacity of their national economies and of the prevailing international economic system to face new problems. The unprecedented world-wide inflation, the rise in unproductive expenditure on the arms race, the slow-down in the growth of international trade, the fluctuations in commodity demand, the parlous balance-of-payments situation of many countries, the intensification of the struggle for markets and raw materials and the new wave of protectionism and restrictive business practices in those economies had had serious repercussions for the world as a whole. The continued existence of a system of relations under which developing countries specialized in raw material exports and acquired food and manufactured goods from developed market economies was perpetuating and aggravating existing inequalities. Besides, the conditions governing international trade and other transactions suffered increasingly from monopolistic pricing, currency profiteering and the outflow of profits earned by transnational corporations in host countries. Against this background, these speakers considered it of fundamental importance to reassert the provisions of the Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

28. A number of speakers noted that the establishment of the new international economic order depended on increased co-operation among countries and that it could only be achieved under peaceful conditions; thus, détente and development were organically connected. Hence, they attached great importance to the cessation of the arms race and to genuine disarmament. Several speakers observed that one consequence of disarmament might be to release real resources that could be employed in furthering the development of developing countries.

29. Some representatives pointed out that, in spite of the difficulties experienced in the decade of the 1970s, a number of the objectives of the International Development Strategy had been fully or almost fully attained. In this connexion they referred to the over-all growth and the per capita growth of the gross domestic product of developing countries and to manufacturing production and the rate of domestic savings in those countries. However, very little progress had been made towards raising agricultural production, especially the output of food, and towards the redistribution of resources, and as a result absolute poverty still remained a grievous reality in many developing countries. The Executive Secretary of ESCAP pointed out the disturbing and continued increase in unemployment and underemployment in the region covered by the Commission during the 1970s. In this context, several representatives observed that the economic growth of many developing countries, particularly the poorest among them, had remained practically stagnant. As was indicated in the report of the Committee for Development Planning (E/1979/37), economic growth in the 1970s had been uneven, mainly because of asymmetries and distortions in the international economic system. A key target for the implementation of the Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade, namely the transfer of 0.7 per cent of the gross national product of developed countries as official development assistance, had remained unfulfilled. In fact, in 1978 such assistance had amounted to about 0.30 per cent of the GNP of those countries, which was even lower than it had been at the beginning of the Decade.

30. In their comments on the preparation of the new development strategy many representatives stated that the strategy should have two fundamental and related objectives: the rapid growth of the economies of developing countries and the construction of a more equitable world economic system, aimed at the establishment of a new international economic order. General Assembly resolution 33/193 laid down clear guidelines for the formulation and realization of precise action-oriented commitments. Thus, the new strategy should define the role and agreed commitments of all countries, expressed in quantified terms and in an agreed time-frame, and establish an average growth rate for developing countries commensurate with the need to halve the gap between their income and that of the developed countries by the end of the century — which would warrant setting a higher target for the over-all growth of developing countries than that for the Second Development Decade.

31. Regarding prospects for the 1980s, the President of the World Bank referred to the three scenarios highlighted in the Bank's World Development Report, 1979. He indicated that the aim should be to reach at least the results projected by the “high” scenario. But even to achieve a lower rate of economic growth for developing countries than that projected by the “high” scenario, that is, 5.6 per cent — a rate which would still leave 600 million people living in absolute poverty by the end of the century - substantial efforts would be required and current trends would have to be reversed. On the one hand, industrialized economies would have to achieve more rapid growth. On the other hand, protectionist pressures would have to be overcome, trade would have to be liberalized and official development assistance would have to grow at a faster pace than the gross national product of donor countries.

32. A number of representatives stressed, with regard to the sectoral balance of the new strategy, that the highest priority should be given to improving the agricultural productivity of developing countries, as a means of providing food security, producing raw materials for their industries, giving employment to their people, improving income distribution, curbing excessive urbanization and improving the external payments position. It was also becoming apparent that the question of energy should receive particular attention. Development could no longer be based on the assumption that supplies of energy would remain cheap. Besides, a judicious balance would have to be struck between social objectives and economic objectives. Economic development and social development were inseparable. Most delegations supported the view that in the final analysis the economic objectives were designed to meet social needs. However, some representatives observed that this proposition should not necessarily imply a “basic needs” approach to development. Such an approach derived from the national experience of countries whose present level of development had been attained over a long period of time, during which their social ills had been gradually remedied. The problems facing developing countries were incomparably greater. For the purpose of solving those problems, a balanced domestic policy would have to be applied in conjunction with an international policy aimed at closing the gap between rich and poor nations. In fact, domestic and particularly external resources were so meagre that developing countries should not be tempted to adopt a policy that was economically unrealistic, such as gearing the whole economy to rural development or to the concept of basic needs.

33. One representative stated that the regional commissions should play an important role in the formulation of the strategy. Since priorities and needs differed markedly from region to region, as well as from nation to nation, it would be one of the tasks of the regional commissions to reconcile in a coherent framework the diversities and different interests of their member countries. With regard to the question of the classification of countries, the view was expressed that the concept of “graduation” as part of the mechanism of international economic co-operation, as well as the concept of selectivity in the negotiating processes now under way, should be rejected.

34. The importance of a strong monetary system for the 1980s and beyond was highlighted by a number of speakers. It was in the interest of both developed and developing countries to assure the adequate financing of increased trade flows, while avoiding excessive currency fluctuations and disruptive capital flows. They regarded the creation of the European Monetary System as a step in the right direction, for it reflected the will of a number of developed market economy countries to bring greater order into the currency market. Some representatives stressed the need for a reform of the conditions governing international monetary movements. At present, the level of international liquidity was determined in the light of domestic policies rather than by considerations of international trade and development, and the most vulnerable countries were unable to protect the purchasing power of their reserves against erosion when the value of the main reserve currency declined. The reform should give special consideration to the increasing participation of developing countries in international monetary decisions and to the recognition by IMF of the need for a liberalization of the terms on which support was given to developing countries in the adjustment of balance-of-payments disequilibria.

35. A number of delegations pointed out that it would not be realistic for the developing countries to set a growth target below their potential on account of external constraints. Without a high growth rate, most developing societies would crumble under the stress of social pressures. It was thus essential to provide for a major increase in resource transfers and to liberalize world trade. So far as resource transfers were concerned, they said that in the past the results achieved through the transfer of private resources had not compensated for the growing gap between targets and realities. Consequently, development assistance should be increased substantially and ways and means should be considered which would assure a more predictable, continuous and secure flow of this assistance. Developed market economies with structural surpluses had an especial responsibility in this respect. Some representatives said that, in view of the problems of the least developed countries, official development assistance should be reoriented with the object of remedying their particular difficulties. At the same time, assistance for other developing countries should give priority to action which would relieve the plight of the poorest among their populations.

36. Several speakers pointed out that, besides an increase in long-term capital flows, the deficit in current account of many developing countries called for more immediate measures. The difficult situation had been recently compounded by the increase in oil prices which would add about $10 billion to the annual import bill of non-oil-exporting developing countries as a group. Under these conditions, it was essential to provide a medium-term facility to which these countries would be able to apply for support in coping with their balance-of-payment deficits and their structural adjustment. In this context, a number of delegations drew attention to the substantial aid that members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) had contributed to developing countries in recent years. As a proportion of the GNP of the countries members of OPEC, it amounted to a multiple of the assistance provided by members of the Development Assistance Committee of OECD.

37. In the opinion of many representatives, the liberalization of world trade was of fundamental importance for the new international development strategy. Besides lessening the external constraints and improving the payments position of developing countries, the consequential rise in demand for exports from developed countries could also have a salutary effect on the economies of those countries. None the less, the results of the recent multilateral trade negotiations had been disappointing for developing countries. Developed market economies had not fulfilled the commitments they had undertaken in Tokyo to liberalize the trade of developing countries, to grant them special and more favourable treatment on a non-reciprocal basis and to agree on a code of safeguards. The most disquieting features were the intensification of protectionist pressures and the introduction of new restrictions, such as voluntary restraints of certain exports from some developing countries, in order to avoid market disruption in the importing countries. A recent study by the OECD secretariat had concluded that the creation of barriers against imports from developing countries would in the long run result in more inflation, more restrictive policies and therefore more unemployment in developed market economies. Thus, liberalization of markets and industrial restructuring in developed market economies would provide the adequate solution to lingering problems.

38. Several speakers stressed that the Common Fund should become operational at an early date so that the agreement reached at the Manila session of UNCTAD on the Integrated Programme for Commodities could be implemented without delay. In addition, they stressed the need to speed up negotiations on specific commodity agreements.

39. Commenting on the subject of food and agriculture, a number of representatives called for both short-term measures and a concerted long-term approach in the context of the new strategy. Although the 1978 harvest had been a relatively good one, the food situation remained critical for many Asian and African countries and more than 20 developing countries were facing abnormal food shortages. Moreover, no substantial improvements in production could be expected in these countries in 1979. In this context, the five-point plan submitted by the Director-General of FAO as an interim world food security measure should receive broad endorsement.

40. The Executive Secretary of ECA stressed that a breakthrough in agricultural production would be Africa's most pressing need in the third United Nations development decade. He observed that in Africa many problems had become more acute during the 1970s. In fact, the low rate of growth in agriculture in the 1960s had been followed by even lower expansion in the 1970s. Several delegations called for an early achievement of the target of $8.3 billion at 1975 prices for assistance to the agriculture of developing countries with a view to achieving a 4 per cent annual rate of growth in agricultural production. They further stressed the significance of the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development (Rome, July 1979), which offered an excellent opportunity for devising ways and means of achieving an expansion of world food output and securing a more equitable distribution of agricultural resources.

41. One representative considered that the new strategy should specify a rate of growth for industrial output consistent with the target of the Lima Plan of Action and envisage an over-all increase in gross domestic product. In this regard, some speakers observed that the third UNIDO Conference in 1980 would be called upon to evaluate the progress achieved in the implementation of the Lima Declaration and Plan of Action and to adopt new measures for promoting industrial production in the developing countries with a view to facilitating the achievement of the Lima target. A number of representatives, referring to the link between industrialization and energy consumption, stated that it would be necessary to assess the full implications of the energy outlook for the achievement of the Lima target.

42. The importance of the energy issue was highlighted by most speakers. The available supply of energy would continue to affect critically the development and diversification of developing countries and stable growth in industrialized countries. At present, it was noted, the world economy was too heavily dependent on oil, which was a depletable energy source and whose conservation was a world imperative. A number of delegations observed that developed countries, being by far the heaviest consumers of oil, bore a special responsibility in the matter of conservation. In this sense, the agreements reached by the European Council meeting in Strasbourg on 21 and 22 June and at the Economic Summit held in Tokyo on 27 and 28 June 1979 were described as welcome developments. A lessening of demand pressures would also contribute to a more adequate balance between demand and supply and price stability.

43. The recent increase in the price of oil, several representatives noted, was merely an effort by oil-exporting countries to maintain the real purchasing power of their export earnings, which had been gradually eroded since early 1974. Although a few oil-exporting countries had no foreign exchange constraints and had a higher per capita income than many other developing countries, the conditions of underdevelopment still persisted in all of them. Additional earnings, added by the higher oil prices could be used in fostering diversification and developing the human and physical infrastructure in these countries. In this context, some speakers stressed that decisions by oil-exporting countries regarding the production and pricing of crude petroleum were taken in the exercise of the right to permanent sovereignty over national resources. This right was expressly laid down in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. The Executive Secretary of ECWA pointed out during the debate that many countries in that Commission's region faced the severe problem of establishing development patterns not based principally on the continuing exploitation of depletable resources.

44. It was pointed out by some speakers that the increase in the price of oil implied additional inflationary pressures and restrained growth in countries facing a relatively large oil-import bill. It was vital, in their opinion, to avoid a further destabilization of the world economy by finding appropriate solutions to the energy problem. There was a certain consensus that the United Nations might become the focal point in the search for solutions and formulation of concerted measures. However, many representatives asserted that such solutions should not be discussed in isolation. The energy problem could and should be dealt with in consultations involving all parties concerned; in other words, such consultations should be universal and should cover the whole set of priority issues confronting the international community, and particularly the North-South dialogue. Such an approach had been agreed upon at the recent meeting of non-aligned countries held at Colombo and also at the fifty-fourth meeting of the OPEC Conference.

45. With regard to energy-related policies, many speakers stressed that, apart from short-term measures, particularly those for solving the problems arising in many developing countries, further steps were required. Speakers stressed that the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, to be held in 1981, should be an occasion for making constructive proposals concerning ways in which energy supplies might be increased. The sound preparation of this Conference was essential. In the meantime, some representatives observed, concerted international action could be initiated for expanding the capability for energy research and development in developing countries; increasing the transfer of technology from industrialized countries, with a view to developing conventional and non-conventional energy sources; and assisting developing countries in introducing energy-saving techniques and in formulating industrial projects with low energy intensity. In the opinion of many representatives, the idea, advanced by the Secretary-General in his introductory remarks, of setting up a world energy institute deserved special consideration. In this regard, some representatives considered it important that the objectives of the proposed institute should be clarified and that constructive consultations should be undertaken for a suitable follow-up.

46. Many representatives emphasized the vital importance of science and technology in development and in the general improvement of living standards for all. The United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development (Vienna, August 1979) should consider such issues as the facilitation of the transfer of technology to developing countries, the improvement of their scientific research and technological development capacities, and the institutional strengthening of the United Nations in this field. Some speakers observed that the preparatory stages had been discouraging, as the developed countries were unwilling to contribute adequately to measures for meeting the requirements of developing countries. Moreover, they criticized the slow progress in negotiations on the Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology.

47. A number of representatives, noting that the Buenos Aires Conference of August/September 1978 had defined the basis for technical co-operation among developing countries, stressed that one of the potentially effective ways whereby the developing countries could foster their own development was to intensify technical co-operation among themselves. Technical as well as economic co-operation among developing countries could and should constitute a vital force in the context of the new strategy for the purpose of restructuring the existing international economic order and achieving collective self-reliance.

48. The achievement of economic independence by developing countries was one of their main objectives, though a number of representatives noted that the road towards independence was still obstructed by formidable obstacles. Thus, the new strategy could be effective only if it aimed at the establishment of an inter-regional and inter-state network of self-reliance.
50. Referring to the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system, several delegations expressed the hope that the current session of the Council would provide an occasion for conducting consultations on the implementation of the consensus reached, in pursuance of General Assembly resolutions 32/197 and 33/202. It was becoming increasingly important to improve co-ordination in the system. However, few steps had been taken to give effect to the relevant decisions. The restructuring of the Council had been successfully commenced but had not yet been concluded. As regards the improvement of the Assembly’s procedures, it was said to be of the greatest importance that the joint reflection given to the subject during the past few months should soon yield tangible progress. The report of the Secretary-General (A/34/320) regarding proposals and recommendations with a view to improving the organization of work of the General Assembly constituted a very helpful document.

51. In this context, a number of representatives drew attention to specific problems affecting the discussion on international economic and social policy. The proliferation of organizations, bodies and meetings had become a self-defeating process. The calendar of meetings was clearly overloaded and the overlapping of subjects was frequent. Documentation was too extensive and some documents were circulated too late for adequate consideration. Developing countries, particularly the poorer ones, had only limited resources and often were not in a position to participate fully in the discussions. Thus, restructuring and rationalization were requisites for a more efficient and more effective international dialogue.

52. Many representatives stressed the Council’s central role in the deliberations on economic and social policy. The world was entering a period that required the acceptance of profound changes in the approach to problems confronting the world community. The United Nations and particularly the Council must play a big role in the resolution of those issues. Increased awareness of current difficulties and obstacles to development should lead to a greater recognition of the need for international co-operation and should strengthen the readiness of Governments to reach agreements. The Council was in a unique position to alert the world community to emerging problems and new challenges. It could be catalytic in mobilizing efforts in support of the necessary changes and of solidarity with those most in need, and hence it had a heavy responsibility. A world in which the majority of people had access to only a fraction of resources was unacceptable in moral and ideological terms, for it would be fraught with the constant risk of conflict and threats to peace; in the final analysis the fundamental issue confronting the Council was that of the survival of humanity.

(b) That, with respect to recurrent documents prepared in pursuance of existing legislative authority, a determination of their continuing justification should also be made in the context of their consideration by the Council;

At the 15th meeting, Mr. Navarrete introduced another draft resolution entitled “Control and limitation of documentation” (E/1979/L.34), which was submitted in his name on the basis of informal consultations. The text of the draft resolution read:

“The Economic and Social Council,

“Recalling its resolution 1979/1 of 9 February 1979 on control and limitation of documentation, and particularly the concern expressed about the volume of documentation, the consequent delays in its circulation and the fact that documents are too often not issued in due time in all the working languages of the Council, aware of the heavy burden therefore placed on the Secretariat and delegations, as well as the increasing financial costs involved,

“Recalling also General Assembly decision 33/417 of 14 December 1978, in which the Assembly welcomed the intention of the bureaux of the Committee on Conferences and of the Economic and Social Council to consult closely in the preparation of the calendar of conferences, Anxious to improve the present situation in order to facilitate and make more effective the work of the Council and its subsidiary bodies,

"1. Notes with appreciation the note by the Secretariat which contains a number of useful suggestions with regard to the volume of documentation, summary records, reports of subsidiary bodies, the form of presentation of documents and the report of the Council to the General Assembly;

2. Decides:

(a) That the Council should continue to review, at each organizational session, the documentation requested under existing legislative authority, with respect to items in its biennial programme of work, in order to determine whether any of it is redundant;

(b) That, with respect to recurrent and other documents prepared in pursuance of existing legislative authority, a determination should be made, in the context of their substantive consideration by the Council, of their continuing justification, including whether any of them have lost their usefulness or can be issued at less frequent intervals;

(c) That restraint be exercised both in the Council and its subsidiary bodies in making new requests for documents and that recurrent documents be requested only when the nature of the subject makes this indispensable;

(d) That, prior to the close of each regular session of the Council, the Secretariat shall submit to the Council a consolidated list of the documentation requested in decisions of the Council under items on its agenda, in order to permit a final review of these requests to establish the legislative authority for the production of such documentation;

(e) That, in future, the provisional agenda for its subsidiary bodies, together with the list of requested documentation, should be submitted to the Council for its review in order, inter alia, to establish greater consistency between the documentation of these bodies and the over-all documentation requested by the Council and other subsidiary bodies and greater consistency between the requests for documentation and the medium-term plan and the programme budget;

(f) That the provision of summary records of all subsidiary bodies of the Council be reviewed at the second regular session of 1979, with a view to reducing the number of instances when summary records are provided;

(g) That, for that purpose, the Secretariat should submit for consideration by the Council revised guidelines concerning the format of the reports of the Council's subsidiary bodies, which should also contribute to greater uniformity and higher standards of presentation;

3. Approves the modifications in the form and presentation of documents contained in the note by the Secretariat; and emphasizes that the 32-page rule for Secretariat reports should apply to the document as a whole, including any annexes and appendices that may be required;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council at its second regular session of 1979 a report showing the actual capacity of the technical services of the United Nations Secretariat to issue documentation simultaneously in all the working languages, in conformity with the six-week rule and the foreseeable calendar of meetings and the consequent need for documentation, together with a breakdown showing the volume and proportion of documentation produced at the request of each of the Council's subsidiary bodies;

5. Decides to issue its report to the General Assembly in separate fascicles and that the report on each agenda item should reflect the chronological sequence of consideration by the Council of the item concerned during the year, and that a single consolidated and bound report containing all the separate item reports should be prepared soon after the Council has concluded its work for the year, including the resumed second regular session;

6. Further decides to review the new format of both its own report to the General Assembly and the reports of its subsidiary bodies at its organizational session for 1980;

7. Further requests the Secretary-General systematically to bring to the attention of all subsidiary bodies, including expert bodies, the relevant provisions of resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly and the Council regarding the control and limitation of documentation, and to ensure that the work of the Secretariat shall be organized so that documentation can be issued in due time in all working languages."

1 Ibid., para. 20.

12. At the same meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom orally proposed that the first paragraph of the preamble should be divided into two paragraphs, the second of which would begin with the words "Aware of the heavy burden".

13. The draft resolution in document E/1979/L.30 was then withdrawn and the Council adopted the draft resolution in document E/1979/L.34, as orally amended. For the final text, see Council resolution 1979/41.

14. At the second regular session of 1979, the Council considered the item at its 34th and 39th meetings, on 23 July and 2 August 1979, and at a number of informal meetings of heads of delegation held between those dates. "(d) To request the Secretariat, for the purposes of a stricter application of rule 13 (4) of the rules of procedure of the Economic and Social Council, to inform the Council and its subsidiary bodies, in the relevant annotated agenda, which documents have not been issued in accordance with the six-week rule, with a full explanation of the reasons which prevented their circulation; the reports on meetings concluded twelve weeks or less before the opening of the session of the Council shall be circulated as soon as possible after the conclusion of such meetings and the Council shall be informed at the outset of the session of the dates on which they are scheduled for circulation;

"(e) To authorize the President of the Economic and Social Council to draw the attention of the General Assembly to the measures taken in 1979 by the Council in response to Assembly resolution 33/56."

*Column A of the calendar gives particulars of the Economic and Social Council programme, as approved by Council decision 1979/81 of 3 August 1979 and subsequently amended by various council decisions, and indicates the legislative authority. Columns B and C indicate, respectively, the meetings of related bodies concerned with economic, social and human rights questions, and the meetings of the governing bodies of specialized agencies and IAEA and certain meetings convened under the auspices of these organizations. The dates of a number of these meetings are tentative and subject to change by the governing bodies concerned. Meetings of groups of experts, seminars and the like convened by the Secretary-General in the context of the programme of work entrusted to him are not mentioned in the calendar.

The Council approved the decision of the Commission on Human Rights in its resolution 11 (XXXV), in response to General Assembly resolution 33/175 of 20 December 1978, to authorize the Chairman of the Commission to appoint Mr. Abdoulaye Diéye as Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Chile and to appoint, as experts in their individual capacity, Mr. Felix Ermacora and Mr. Waleed M. Sadi to study the question of the fate of missing and disappeared persons in Chile (Council decision 1979/32).

The Council, upon the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights (resolution 12 (XXXV)), approved the decision of the Commission to extend the mandate of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on southern Africa (Council decision 1979/34).
